Book Project

“Monopoly Politics: Price Competition and Learning in the Evolution of Policy Regimes”

The book project, based on my dissertation, explains why many advanced industrial states have experienced long-term policy alternations between favoring price competition and promoting the market power of dominant firms. Using original archival evidence from eight archives in the United States and France, I challenge existing conventional wisdom regarding “national models” of political economy and the origins of economic policy change. I draw on insights from microeconomics, psychology, sociology, and bureaucratic politics to argue that policymakers are drawn to simple mental models of competition or market power that forestall policy reconsideration and predispose leaders to see policies in simple terms of whether they promote competition or not. The changes to these policy regimes occur primarily because of accumulating diminishing returns to competition or market power, but which are initially ignored by policymakers committed to the policy regime.
